

Maybe instead of making government

BIGGER

we should focus on making government

BETTER.

We need regulatory reform, but the proposed Consumer Financial Protection Agency (CFPA) is not the reform we need. Rather than fixing the problems that lie in front of us, this agency will just create a new layer of government bureaucracy. And who will pay for it? Sadly, it will likely be businesses and consumers through fees placed on check, credit card, debit card, and ATM transactions. Six federal agencies are already charged with protecting consumers. Let's give them the authority to better enforce the rules that already exist and root out the bad apples that harm consumers. We need financial reform, but we can't afford the CFPA.
